HORSES FOR OKLAHOMA FARMS

J. A. BEALL
Animal Husbandry Department, Oklahoma A. and M. College

So much has been written about the feeding, management and care of the farm horse that very little can be added that will be of benefit to the experienced horseman. However, to the beginner, and we have many such new men in Oklahoma in the last few years, who are just beginning to experience the thrill and satisfaction that comes with working a high class team of well mated, well behaved draft mares, there are still many points of interest.

There is no question but that financial profit results from owning mares that earn their feed by furnishing farm power and at the same time produce many hundred dollars worth of colts.

Breeding the working mare places double duty on her; consequently she should be the hardiest individual with proper conformation and she must have good care and treatment. With two sources of profit from one animal, farmers can well afford to pay more for such stock, feed it more heavily and give it special attention. The small farmer is the one most likely to get the best results from such a plan, as he usually works his own teams and is in a position to watch them closely and see that they are treated properly.

SELECTING MARES FOR OKLAHOMA FARMS

In selecting foundation stock two requirements must be kept in mind. They must be breeders and workers. Purebred mares are not a necessity but if a good registered stallion is available, purebred mares of the same breeding will probably give better returns than grades. It costs practically no more to raise a purebred colt than it does a grade. The amount of money that can be invested in the mares is an important factor in determining whether purebreds or grades should be used. Personal preference always has a lot to do with the type or breed that each farmer may select and often times this point is the key to success or failure. However, it is generally advisable to breed the prevailing type of your community, since by so doing sales are more easily made and the services of high-class stallions are practically assured.

The uniformity of the mares on a particular farm should be given paramount consideration. There is satisfaction and convenience in having mares similar enough in type and action so that they look and handle well in teams. It is good advertisement and attests to the owner's judgment and ability as a horseman.

If the mares resemble one another and are bred to the same stallion it is possbile to sell the young horses in pairs at quite a premium. The market for this kind of stock will not be overcrowded in Oklahoma for several years. Anyone who has been confronted with the difficult task of trying to buy a good young team of matched mares or horses in this state will attest to this statement.

CONFORMATION

Breed character and size are important characteristics in purebred or grade mares, they signify the right kind of ancestry and prepotency. Femininity of expression and conformation is an indication of good breeding qualities. Style, good disposition, large, round feet, open at the hoof head, clean hard, flat bone, straight, well placed legs, a deep wide body heavily muscled and a strong constitution are qualities especially desired in breeding mares. An inspection of a mare's colts is always the best method of reaching a determination as to her breeding worth. Shy breeding mares should always be weeded out as generally unprofitable.

UNSOUNDNESS IN BREEDING STOCK

Unsoundness, for our purpose, may be defined as anything which interfers with the usefulness of the animal. Unsound horses cause breeders much financial loss; consequently it is of the utmost importance that all horses be perfectly sound.

The following kinds of unsoundness are considered by most good horsemen as being sufficient reason for eliminating breeding stock from the herd: Ring bone, side bone, bone spavin, heaves, stringhalt, blindness, partial or complete, moon blindness and badly puffed hocks. Horses become unsound because the tissue or structure at a particular point of the body is inherently weak or because there may be a strain exerted upon that particular part too great for the best of conformation. If bad conformation exists the horses should not be used for breeding purposes, whether they are sound or not. When considering horses that are unsound but apparently have good conformation, it is usually difficult to decide whether the conformation is at fault or whether an unbearable strain was the cause. Consequently these animals, too, should not be used as breeders unless it is positively known that the unsoundness developed after severe labor had been performed in amounts or to a degree much greater than performed by the average horse.

BREEDING CONSIDERATIONS

There is considerable discussion among horsemen as to the proper age at which fillies should be bred. Many excellent horsemen believe that breeding fillies at two years of age insures a more regular-breeding aged mare. They may or may not allow them to lay off one year when they are three or four years old. Others believe that a filly should not be bred until three years old, thereby allowing for proper development of the individual and giving ample time to get the animal broke and well trained before becoming inpregnated.

In general, we might say, that it is proper to breed a quiet, well developed, good conditioned two year old filly. On the other hand, if the filly is thin and small it might be better to wait until the third year before breeding.

HINTS FOR HORSE BREEDERS

OLIVER S. WILLHAM
Animal Husbandry Department, Oklahoma A. and M. College

The improvement of horses by means of various breeding methods is a slow process as compared with the improvement brought about by the same methods when used in connection with other farm animals. Improvement must be measured by generations and not by years. On the average it takes from six to eight years for one generation of horses, while it takes only two and one-half years for one generation of pigs. It is imperative that a program of horse breeding be planned and carried out for a long period of time if much progress is made.

Since the horse is not used to any extent except as a beast of burden, the old and crippled individuals often become a burden to some horsemen. The old cow or sow can be sold on the market for a fair price but the old horse must either be kept at considerable expense until it dies a natural death or it must be killed. This latter system seems heartless in cases where a horse has lived a long and profitable life for its owner. Some old mares will continue to breed, which helps to overcome this difficulty.

The first requirement of a market horse is soundness. Every horse breeder is confronted with the problem of disposing of his surplus horses from time to time. In order to command a high price he must offer sound horses for sale. There is a great tendency, especially among small horse breeders, to sell their sound horses and keep as breeders the animals turned down by the horse buyer. Most unsoundnesses are the direct result of an hereditary defect or weakness in conformation and such horses should never be used as breeders.

Purebreds are just as important in horses as in other farm animals. Purebred horses will be more certain of transmitting their characteristics to their offspring than will grade or scrub animals. It seems that a program urging the use of purebred sires in horses might be a little more needed at present in horses than in other farm animals for the horses probably suffered more economically as a result of the depression.

The horse breeder not only has a longer road to travel than the breeder of other farm animals but he has more dangerous crossroads which are likely to impede his progress. It is necessary that he pursue a safe, sound system of breeding if he is to make much of an impression upon his breed of horses during his lifetime.

Horsemen must use sound horses as breeders if they expect to produce sound offspring. They must be especially critical of horses having unsoundnesses which may be traced to hereditary defects. Breeders must endeavor to obtain as many of the desirable characters as possible in their breeding animals. Selection cannot be as critical in horses as in some other classes of farm animals or account of the smaller numbers. It is very seldom that a mare colt is not used by some as a breeder. The number of purebred stallion colts castrated on account of poor individuality is small when compared with other animals.

Environmental conditions under which animals are raised vary a lot from herd to herd. It is impossible for the horseman to tell how much of the difference between two prospective sires is due to heredity. He is primarily interested in the hereditary portion of the difference because it is all that will be transmitted. In some farm animals it has been found that on the average only one-fourth to one-third of the differences are of a hereditary nature. If this be true in the case of horses, and there is very little reason to doubt that it is, then the breeder is often fooled in his selections by environment. This can be avoided to some extent by a critical examination of the sire, dam, brothers and sisters of the prospective herd sire. If the parents of the horse are old there will be a number of half-brothers and half-sisters from the sires side. If they are good breeders it will be an indication that the horse in question will likely be a good breeder. The numbers of brothers and sisters or half brothers and half sisters through the dams side will not be so numerous but they will also furnish good indications of breeding ability. A study of the sire and dam is also helpful.

Strict selection in a breed or herd brings about a rapid improvement at first. This improvement becomes slower and slower as the goal is approached. It is generally found that a herd improved by selection only deteriorates very quickly when selection ceases. In order to fix or hold this improvement it is necessary to use a system of breeding in conjunction with selection. Linebreeding is the system of breeding generally used.

Linebreeding is a form of inbreeding which is planned to concentrate the blood of some good animal in a herd or breed. It is very necessary that selection be used in a herd first. The general merit of the herd must be good before any consideration of blood is undertaken. If a good individual shows up in a good herd it will pay to try concentrating the blood of this individual in the herd. Once the linebreeding is started it is very necessary that selection be continued and be just as critical as before. Linebreeding tends to fix characters in the linebred individuals. This will make them prepotent for such characters. There is no way except through selection to govern which characters are fixed. Linebreeding is just as apt to fix poor characters as it is good characters. It is possible, by means of a well planned linebreeding program, to keep a herd rather highly related to some outstanding sire for a long period following the death of this noted sire. If the noted sire has a minimum of poor characters there will be little danger of fixing any poor characters. Linebreeding along with selection affords the best method of permanent improvement. It must be kept in mind, however, that the herd must be raised to a certain point by selection first and then the individual to which the linebreeding is directed must be good.

Ordinarily it does not pay the small breeder to undertake a line breeding program. It is impossible to tell ahead of time whether the linebreeding will be successful or not. This should always be considered especially where the breeder is not financially able to stand the loss that may be entailed from a failure of the linebreeding to work right.

The horse breeders are going to have to use precautions the next few years to prevent the general merits of their breeds from lowering due to the drive to increase numbers. The depression caused a large number of undesirable horses to not be used as breeders and thereby aided selection. The reaction toward the other side should be guarded.
